HISTORY

Mamaroneck, a Native American name translated as “the place where the sweet waters fall into the sea,” is located just twenty-three miles north of New York City on Long Island Sound. Established at the mouth of a river and at the head of a harbor, John Richbell a London merchant living in Oyster Bay, purchased the land in 1661 from the local Siwanoy Indians for a supply of tools, kettles, clothing and wampum.

On May 17, 1788 the Town of Mamaroneck was officially created by an act of the New York State Legislature. 18th and 19th Century residents earned their livelihood by farming, fishing, lumbering and milling. Manufacturing arrived with the 19th century and most was located (as it is today) in the Mamaroneck Village section. Larchmont Village and the Unincorporated Town were, and largely remain, residential.

Today, the Town of Mamaroneck, with its beautiful Long Island Sound waterfront and easy access to highways, airports and Metro North train service to New York City and Stamford is a prime suburban residential community.

TRANSPORTATION

Larchmont and Mamaroneck are stops on Metro North Railroad with commuting time of approximately 31 and 35 minutes to Manhattan's Grand Central Terminal. There is bus transportation via Bee-Line, Para-Transit, along with taxi service.

Those who live here quickly become spoiled by the wealth of recreational opportunities and the picture postcard views of water, sky and sailboats.
